A Parisian Breakinridge.
Mlle. Alice Pinard, a skilled musician and a composer of note, arrayed herself in full bridal costume, locked herself in her room in Paris, lit several furnaces of charcoal, and was found in the morning stone dead. She left a note stating that she wished to carry the secret of her life intact into the grave, and earnestly requested no one to try to pry into it. Human nature is so constructed that if one is requested not to investigate a secret, the whole world instantly investigates it. So it was in this case, and the whole world is chuckling in glee over the fact that a former Senator, an ex-pastor, M. Dide, was the direct cause of the poor girl's suicide.
It seems that Mlle. Pinard was madly in love with this gentleman, and he reciprocated the attachment; that they took various journeys together, and he wrote her numerous touching letters in which he called her his "dear little wife," &c., and swore that as soon as he succeeded in divorcing his first wife he would marry Mlle. Pinard. He obtained his divorce, said nothing about the fact, but went peaceably away and married another woman. Three days ago the deserted Alice discovered that the man she loved and trusted had betrayed her, and went to his apartment and made a most fearful scene before several people who were dining with the newly married pair. The pastor, it is said, told her that he still loved her, and had married merely for money. If Mlle. Pinard had been a hard-headed Anglo-Saxon, she would have sued the ex-Senator for breach of promise and obtained heavy damages, which are accorded even in France; but being a sentimental Parisian, she merely invoked the malediction of heaven upon the betrayer's household, and told him she would kill herself. He calmly replied that people who threaten to commit suicide never carried out the threat; but it appears that this lady was the exception, which proves that rule.
M. Dide is a Parisian Anthony Comstock. He is the president of the association for the suppression of immorality in the streets of Paris. He is seized with speechless horror when he beholds one of the exquisite studies of the nude, in which Jules Lefebvre excels, and his piety was the admiration of all beholders. In short, he was a living example of the dictum of the late Archbishop of Paris, to whom some priest was vaunting the strict religious observances of a man whom the Archbishop knew to be a scamp. His reply was: "It is infinitely easy to say one's prayers; it is infinitely hard to do one's duty."
The opinion of Mme. Dide, now that it is asserted that her husband said he married her simply for money, has not yet developed; but when there is a congress of cads the ex-Senator, ex-pastor, and ex-saint is quite sure of an apotheosis and a gold medal for his supremacy in that contemptible vocation.
